What can teen-agers do to help make the UN work?

Those who were born in the same year that saw the birth of the United Nations are now fourteen years old, but younger or older, all youth is facing the same challenge of working for a better understanding among peoples in the atomic and space age. The concept of a world forum to which nations could turn for peace, justice and order is an important element in our modern political thinking and international political structure.

For a student today, this concept constitutes the very climate in which he is born. He must know the community in which he is maturing, for as a citizen he will receive stability from it and in turn will be required to serve it, for the common good.

A student should find the United Nations an exhilarating study, for such an organization is founded on the noblest dreams, the highest aspirations of man, to which youth can bring purity, vitality and courage.

Can the UN ever give us a world without fear?

In two respects, at least, I think our hope of progress toward achieving the purposes to which we are committed is better founded than that of past generations. Therefore, our responsibility is also greater. Those before us did not possess the instrument of the United Nations. It is imperfect and experimental and it was born of extreme necessity. Nevertheless, it is a significant step toward a better organization of human society. We know also that the unprecedented advances in knowledge of our generation have confronted mankind both with its greatest danger and its greatest opportunity.

Has the UN brought us closer to a world without fear?

The main direction of the work of the United Nations indicates the path which the world must follow in order to preserve past achievements and lay a basis for a happier future.

Service of the United Nations, guided by the principles of the Charter, is profoundly meaningful—whether it bears immediate fruit or not. If it paves one more inch of the road ahead, one is more than rewarded by what is achieved.

How much strength does the UN have?

The Organization has not been able, always and fully, to master the great difficulties it has had to face. But it should in justice be said that it has paved the way for peaceful solutions of most of the conflicts on which it has been called upon to try its strength. Although it is a new venture, with possibilities only partly explored, it has justified the hopes of those who have served it. It may pave the way for a future structure of international life with the greater authority which, I believe, one day must come.
